Artifacts are objects made by humans, and they can tell us a lot about the people who made them and the culture they lived in. In the case of ancient Rome, artifacts have been found that give us insights into everything from the food people ate to the games they played. One of the most fascinating things about these artifacts is that they show us that, despite living in a time and place so different from our own, the ancient Romans were not so different from us after all. They had the same basic needs and desires as we do, and they enjoyed many of the same activities.

One of the most important artifacts that has been found from ancient Rome is the Lararium. A Lararium was a small shrine that was found in almost every Roman house. It was dedicated to the Lares, who were the household gods. The Lares were believed to protect the family and home, and they were often depicted as small statues. Families would make offerings to the Lares on a regular basis, and they would pray to them for protection and good fortune.

Another important artifact that has been found from ancient Rome is the amphora. Amphorae were large, two-handled jars that were used to store and transport liquids. They were made of clay, and they were often decorated with beautiful designs. Amphorae were used to store a variety of liquids, including wine, oil, and water. They were also used to transport goods, such as grain and olives.

In addition to these two important artifacts, many other objects have been found that give us insights into daily life in ancient Rome. These objects include everything from cooking utensils to toys. By studying these artifacts, we can get a better understanding of what life was like for ordinary Romans. We can see how they lived, worked, and played. We can also see how their culture and beliefs influenced their everyday lives.
